

Count's Heart Bleeds For the Lot of You

By Count Marco

I have always maintained that none of you married women should work unless circumstances beyond your control make you the sole support of a family. In that case your have my permission.

Some of you will reach the executive capacity. Few women make good bosses. As one woman complained about her female supervisor, "She could teach dirty fighting to the Marines."

Another wrote, "Please do a great kindness. We work in an office run by women and it is dreadful, and we are all sad and gloomy. Our boss looks like Hitler would have looked if he'd been a woman."

"If we had a man boss who would come in in the morning and smile at all of us we would work harder and bless Mr. Blank or whoever runs this store."

"A woman boss resents seeing a smile on the face of her employees. She seems to believe that everyone should look as miserable as she looks. I can see why her husband left her. Please help us. You have a lot of influence.—Anonymous."

My heart bleeds for the lot of you. Many a divorcee reaches a position of influence on her job through seniority, hard work or sex, meanwhile losing a husband in the interim because too much time was spent on the job. After discovering that pouring over business papers after hours isn't the fun or security of pawing over a good man, she takes her bitterness out on other women around her.

Her attitude is, "If I can't have a man and am miserable, I'll make all other women just as miserable." She succeeds.

If you must work and are in an executive or supervisory position you can get just as much accomplished with polite requests.

A cheerful smile in the morning, a pleasant good night or good bye and a sincere "thank you" with an encouraging pat on the back do more for morale and the job itself than spreading unrest and discontent with a constant sucking-on-the-lemon look.

Don't make close friends with members of your staff. Don't engage in gossip about others in the office. When you give an order, don't hover. And never, never lose your temper. It's unfeminine. A good supervisor is one who can delegate authority confident of expecting good results.

State your rules when hiring and be sure they're understood. Don't change them back and forth as the whims dictate.

Finally, if a girl is beyond her prime and a little slow, don't hound her. She is probably more dependable than most young ones.

And, even with more finality, when the first man proposes to you, snag him fast and get back home where you belong. So be it.
